

My Lady's Secrets

ALSO BY KATY MORAN

Game of Hearts

Wicked by Design

Scandalous Alchemy

My Lady's Secrets

KATY MORAN

An Aria Book

First published in the UK in 2024 by Head of Zeus Ltd, part of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc

Copyright © Katy Moran, 2024

The moral right of Katy Moran to be identified as the author of this work has been asserted in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act of 1988.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means,
electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of both the copyright owner and the above publisher of this book.

This is a work of fiction. All characters, organizations, and events portrayed in this novel are either products of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously.

9 7 5 3 1 2 4 6 8

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

ISBN (HB): 9781035914241

ISBN (E): 9781803280202

Typeset by Divaddict Publishing Solutions Ltd.

Cover design: Micaela Alcaino

Printed and bound in Great Britain by
CPI Group (UK) Ltd, Croydon CR0 4YY

Head of Zeus Ltd
First Floor East
5-8 Hardwick Street
London EC1R 4RG

WWW.HEADOFZEUS.COM

*To Lucy and Alec, who could not be less like the Butes.
Thank you for giving my imagination somewhere
special to fly*

On 11 May, at the hour of five o'clock in the evening, Spencer Perceval, the prime minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, was SHOT DEAD by John Bellingham, a Liverpool merchant with a grievance against the government.

The Globe
12th May 1812

'More of these damned Scoundrels must go the same way and then the poor people may live.'
'This is but the beginning'

Samuel Taylor Coleridge, quoting interviewees in The Morning Post

Part One

If I should meet thee after long years,
How should I greet thee?
With silence and tears

Lord Byron, 'When We Two Parted'

1

Cressida clung to the wisteria vine and set one foot onto the first-floor balcony railing, trying to ignore a spine-cracking drop to the walkway below. Her chest heaved with exertion. The soldiers who had pursued her across London could only be moments away. Of all the places she really didn't want to get caught breaking into, Fife House was top of the list: home of Lord Liverpool, Secretary of State for War and unofficial government spymaster.

Oh, hell. With a swift exhalation, Cressida shifted her other foot onto the balcony and relinquished her grip on the twisted wisteria trunk, only then allowing herself to jump down into the balcony itself, which was dominated by a large, unshuttered window that had been left ajar. Breathe. Just breathe. For a moment, she crouched amid a drift of bruised wisteria petals with the sulphuric stink of gunpowder still in her hair.

Cressida's pursuers had been close behind ever since she'd shaken off her guards in the aftermath of a bone-shaking explosion at the Port of London. All were officers. Exactly the sort she did her best to avoid.

Sometimes, in Cressida's barefoot and often drunken years with first the British army and then the French, she had exchanged information for coinage or rum: perhaps the positioning and morale of troops, whether their supply wagons were stranded on the wrong side of a ravine. Sometimes, there was a price to pay for that.

Cressida got to her feet: as ever, there was nowhere to go but onwards.

Lady Liverpool was entertaining this evening: the room beyond the balcony blazed with candlelight. It was quiet, though: good. Her ladyship must have kept her guests corralled downstairs. Cressida brushed down the green satin skirts of the evening gown she'd stolen before the siege, filched from a French commandant's wife in an ancient Spanish walled town, where the night was heavy with woodsmoke and the scent of charred herbs. She tucked a stray ringlet behind her ear, raised the sash window and stepped into the quiet of Lord Liverpool's library, accompanied by a sudden volley of barking so loud it rent the air.

Cressida caught her breath, making the usual rapid assessment that had saved her life on more than one occasion. Bookshelves reached all the way up to the embossed ceiling; blazing candlelight picked out gold lettering on leather-bound spines. Two footmen in powdered wigs and gold-laced blue livery stood by an imposing fireplace of rose-pink marble, imprisoned by a bear. Cressida stood very still, breathing in the acrid, animal reek of a creature in distress even as the bear whipped around to face her, letting out another volley of excited barking. It was a dog, of course, the size of a small pony.

Cressida held up one hand, palm outwards. 'Stop at once. Oh, what nonsense.'

The dog stood easily three feet high at the shoulders and leaped at Cressida with such weight and force that it took some effort to steady herself. Hairy paws landed on her shoulders with staggering force, and Cressida had to gather her strength to remove them, one by one.

'Sit.'

Recognising a true mistress when he heard one, the dog settled back on his haunches, shaking his great ursine head with a spray of saliva. Cressida turned her attention to the footmen, who had by now scrambled to block her path to the door; these were men trained never to forget a face. They knew, after all, who she was.

'Lady Liverpool is not at home to visitors.' The taller footman smirked, even as the sounds of distant merriment drifted into the room from downstairs: wild laughter, a concerto.

His colleague sneered. 'Out the way you came, milady, unless you're wishful for us to call the Runners. Scotland Yard is just across the way, after all. That or we can march you out through the servants' quarters: we always do like a bit of light entertainment below stairs.'

The dog – a Newfoundland crossed with a mastiff, perhaps – let out a low, rumbling growl that Cressida felt through the soles of her feet.

‘Oh, I don’t think we need create a spectacle, do you? Are you going to open the door or not?’ Cressida asked, gently. ‘Come.’ This last directive was issued to the Newfoundland cross, now at her side, and together they left Lady Liverpool’s footmen to concoct their excuses for being outmanoeuvred by a fallen woman and a dog.

At the top of the wide marble staircase, Cressida rested one hand briefly on the dog’s vast shoulder as he waited at her side, quivering with anticipation.

‘Come on then,’ she said. ‘I’ll take you to his lordship.’

The Newfoundland whined with longing, the object of all his desires now within reach. Cressida knew by the time they both reached the foot of the stairs that her command over him had wavered. A pair of large gilded double doors had been thrown open, and here the babble from within grew ever louder. Cressida breathed in the scent of over-warm bodies and champagne breath. There was still time to run away from all this, not that she had anywhere to go, no other choice at all in fact. Silence descended. With the dog at her side, Cressida walked into Lady Liverpool’s drawing room.

Somewhere, someone dropped a glass of claret-cup, and the bright burst of broken glass rang out. Cressida caught sight of familiar faces from her youth, people she had known, and some she’d even liked. Those closest to her turned their backs in a flurry of shivering ostrich feathers and shimmering silk. It was to be expected. Cressida smiled as the dog left her side, bounding towards one of the side doors, spraying drool and now unstoppable. Cressida followed in his wake, looking neither right nor left until her companion let out a crescendo of excited barking and surged into the side-chamber, knocking aside an acne-ridden young footman like a single painted ninepin.

Cressida followed her companion into a room with an embossed ceiling and panelled walls hung with portraits of people and horses, all framed in heavy gilt. She shut the door behind her at speed, which was just as well. A dark-haired young man of about her own age was vigorously swiving a slight woman bent over a chaise longue. Her skirts were pushed up around her waist and Cressida just had time to register a head of cropped fair curls and a cry of shocked indignation, which would have been maidenly had it not emerged from the lips of Lady Caroline Lamb. Someone had drawn long brocade curtains across the tall window that faced out onto Whitehall. This did little to muffle the tail end of a riot: broken glass and hobnailed boots upon the paving-slabs. Out in the street, someone was singing one of the new rebel songs, lauding General Ludd in a reedy falsetto. With one final workmanlike thrust George Gordon, Lord Byron pulled away and turned around to face Cressida. His fine lawn shirt was in fantastic disarray, both his dark eyebrows raised, his face flushed with spent desire and that wary, irresistible smile upon his lips. Lady Caroline whirled around, yanking down the fragile skirts of her gown. Her eyes narrowed as she recognised Cressida. One word was enough.

'You!'

This was too much for Cressida's companion, who bounded forward to greet his master, both paws upon his shoulders.

'Show some propriety, Timothy.' Byron laughed, tucking in his shirt and everything else back into his breeches with his one available hand as he fended off the dog with the other.

‘I thought you said you wouldn’t get another after Boatswain?’ Cressida demanded, as Byron buttoned up the fall of his breeches, one-handed. He ignored Caroline, who was white-faced as she retied her garter, her large, expressive eyes glittering with unshed tears.

‘Oh, Timothy’s not mine,’ Byron said. ‘Down, you wretched thing. I’m just looking after him.’

Caroline poured herself a brandy from a decanter on the side table and flung herself onto the chaise longue, canny enough not to storm out of the room while she still looked unmistakably like someone in receipt of a flyer.

Byron spread his hands out wide in a gesture of helpless confusion. ‘Dare I even ask what you want, Cress?’

Cressida smiled. ‘I need to get out of the country before they hang me.’ She hated this part: ‘And a loan of a few hundred or so. I won’t trouble you again.’

‘You chose a fine time to come home. It’s a damned thing when the Prime Minister can be shot dead in the House of Commons.’ For once lost for words, Byron gesticulated at the window. Outside, rioters howled an approximation of ‘The Cutty Wren’. Rebel songs meant one thing when all was said and done: a fine crop on the gallows.

‘Whatever happened to that boy who wanted to build the world anew? Revolution is neither tidy nor convenient,’ Cressida said.

Byron frowned at her, then shot a quick glance at his mistress, before switching into effortless French. ‘Darling, I suppose it’d be a fool’s errand to mention Greville at this point?’

Cressida laughed, recalling the mob of siege-crazed

British soldiers advancing on her in an ancient Spanish town, forcing her to back up against the bloodstained, crumbling wall where they had shot French survivors.

Step away from the lady. Achinglly recognisable, the voice had come from behind them all.

She'd known him immediately, even with the familiar lines and planes of his face darkened with gunpowder, and even in the dusty, bloodied dark green uniform of the Rifles, not dressed for the balls or country houses where in truth he had always been so bored and restless.

She recalled odd details that flew upon her like hornets in a rush of memory and sensation: how Greville hadn't been wearing his fur-plumed shako helmet and how the dark waves of his hair were crusted with sweat and blood but touched gold by the sun, the dark gaze that had once been full of humour now scorching with slow, deliberate hatred right down the length of her body.

Thanks to Greville, she was still alive.

Thanks to Greville, she had been arrested for treason, brought back to an England on the brink of revolution to face what passed for justice these days, and as of this afternoon was now a fugitive on the run.

'Cressida!' The panic in Byron's voice brought her sharply back to the present. 'I'm going to regret this – listen: the Season's nearly dead and buried. I've received more invitations to house parties than I know what to do with, but I've accepted your cousin's. Meet me at Drochcala? It would be wiser to discuss this another time.'

He wasn't wrong. A selection of Lady Liverpool's burlier footmen had advanced into the room; she couldn't afford to be marched through a drawing room like some kind of criminal. Instead, she followed Byron's gaze to the window that gave out right onto Whitehall itself and sketched a mocking curtsey, which he returned with an equally unserious bow. Then she ran.

2

Not half an hour before, Lieutenant Colonel Lord Greville Nightingale snagged one of Bessy Tot's small tables in the taproom at the Oxford Arms, deep in the environs of the Devil's Acre. Greville had taken off his shako, but he was still clad in the dark green officer's tunic and the grey breeches of the 95th Rifles: he hadn't been home since the Princess Sophie docked at the Port of London that afternoon. He felt an odd sense of dislocation: everything about the Oxford was familiar, from Bessy's weary smile and dishevelled red ringlets to her husband, Thomas, leaning on the bar, exchanging quips with a stripling street-walker in a satin gown that was so big she'd pinned it clumsily across the bodice. It was all a world away from the war he'd left behind in Spain: campfires, siege trenches, mud and rubble, the permanent bitter taste of gunpowder in his mouth. His uniform and evident rank drew suspicious glances from Bessy and Thomas's patrons: riots had exploded all over London since the prime minister's assassination less than twenty-four hours earlier, and still no one knew whether that fatal shot fired in the House of Commons was the first of a full-blown revolution.

Greville could have done without it: God only knew he'd had no desire to come back to England at all and yet, courtesy of his extremely estranged wife and his oldest friend, here he was. He sat at a table near a leaded window with a clear line to the door, his body thrumming with a soldier's awareness even as he stretched out his long legs, crossing them at the ankle. Bessy brought the gin and he dropped the coinage into her outstretched hand without even returning her smile, a rare lapse of courtesy. Greville saw only Cressida in the ruins of a Spanish town, clad in a gown of spoiled silk, her face bloodied, her fingers and her lips black with gunpowder, tangled auburn curls loose around her shoulders, with that fire in her dark eyes he had never forgotten, not in all these years.

Greville drained his gin; he should have told Bessy just to bring the tin jug and have done with it.

Major Lord Arthur Lascelles of the Peninsular Corps of Guides walked into the Oxford then, all blue superfine and exquisitely polished top-boots. Raconteur, childhood companion and devious expert in military intelligence, evidently Lascelles had at least found time to change since his ship docked, just hours before Greville's. His hair was arranged with a stylish element of en deshabille, the ironic tilt of his smile exactly the same as it had been in the overheated London salons of their youth. With a swift glance around the gloomy reaches of the tavern, Lascelles lowered himself into the chair opposite Greville, letting out a small sigh. By rights, Lascelles ought to have laid himself open to attention from cutpurses, but no Devil's Acre thief would make the attempt on him.

Lascelles beckoned to Bessy for porter and she bustled across the room in her best gown of grubby glazed calico. Her eyes widened with alarm at the expression on Greville's face; she refilled his glass without a word and retreated.

Lascelles sighed. 'The court martial's over, Grev. You could be on furlough in Lisbon with a girl on each arm.'

Greville smiled in such a way that even Lascelles flinched; after boarding the Sophie in the heat of a white-hot fury, he'd had two weeks at sea to consider the wisdom of pursuing his errant wife and Lascelles back to England. 'Is that really all you summoned me here to say?' Greville leaned back in his chair and allowed the glass of daffy to swing gently from his fingertips as he raised it in salute.

'No,' Lascelles said. 'It's not even the half of what I have to say to you. You could literally have escorted Cressida out into the hills after catching her on the wrong side, given her a horse and never laid eyes upon the wretched hellcat again. That siege and the aftermath was chaotic and hardly the British army's finest hour; no one would have been any the wiser. Instead you arrested Cressida and then beat the Guards officer who apprehended her, in territory we'd just recovered from the French, into a bloody pulp, earning yourself a court martial in the process. He was a baronet's son: you can't thrash men like that into next week without consequence. Now your wife is my problem. Why?'

'I don't care who his father is. He would have forced her before he cut her throat and I would have done the same if he'd tried it on any woman.' As for the rest, Greville had asked himself the same question at sea, multiple times, and found no satisfactory answer. He was also uncomfortably aware that his own rank in society was what had swung the court martial in his favour.

'Don't give me that look,' Lascelles went on. 'If it's also because on some level, Greville, you couldn't leave Cressida a second time, go back to Spain.'

'Give me a good reason why I should not also beat you to a bloody pulp. Sir,' Greville said.

Lascelles gave Greville his most disarming smile. 'Because I pushed that ogre Arbuthnot down the stairs at Winchester when he questioned your mother's virtue?'

Greville watched him. 'Keep Sylvia's name out of your mouth. You knew.' He measured out each word. 'My wife has been following the army with no protection and no honour, living among the camp followers and surviving God knows how, for years, and you knew.'

She'd run away after a night Greville preferred to forget, disappearing from London society like campfire smoke on the wind.

'What are you going to do with her?' Greville spoke with a calm he wasn't even close to feeling and drained the last of his gin.

Lascelles gave him a steady look across the table. 'You captured Cressida in territory we'd taken from the French. She was on the wrong side, Greville. She was lucky not to be shot, hanged, or otherwise quietly disposed of, and that's before we even consider her father.'

Greville stared back. 'The less said about Rosmoney the better.'

'I agree, but having a criminal for a father won't help her now.'

'Did it ever?' Greville demanded.

Lascelles spoke with restrained calm. 'The whole country is on the brink of revolution and the Prime Minister has just been murdered. Lord Liverpool and the Committee of Secrecy have a long reach and your wife was just caught with our enemy. You must understand that a whiff of treason is more dangerous than ever.'

'Believe me, blue blood or not, the only thing that will keep your wife out of either an extremely humiliating public trial for treason or, more likely, a very unfortunate accident is for her to become indispensable. If Cressida was in enough trouble before Perceval was shot, in all honesty I now think she'll be lucky to survive the next month.'

'Oh, spare me whatever devious sneaking bloody plot you have in mind,' Greville said; he wanted no part in Lascelles' intelligencing, and most particularly not if Lascelles had designs on involving his wife. 'Where is she?'

'Well.' Lascelles leaned back in his chair. He'd never been afraid of Greville.

Greville stared at him, his eyes narrowed. Lascelles would sooner cut his own throat than admit fault: he'd been like this since they were eight years old. 'She came back to England under your escort. You've lost her, haven't you?'

'Someone threw a grenade just as we were disembarking: it was a little chaotic. The Hellion lost a horse and sixteen crates of chambord. Your wife and her maid took the opportunity to lose themselves.'

'My God, if you've got even half a plan you'd better start talking,' Greville said.

Lascelles smiled, which had always meant trouble.