

You loved your last book...but what are you going to read next?

Using our unique guidance tools, Lovereading will help you find new books to keep you inspired and entertained.

Opening Extract from...

The Light Between Oceans

Written by M. L. Stedman

Published by Doubleday

All text is copyright © of the author

This Opening Extract is exclusive to Lovereading.
Please print off and read at your leisure.

The LIGHT BETWEEN OCEANS

M. L. Stedman

Doubleday

LONDON • TORONTO • SYDNEY • AUCKLAND • JOHANNESBURG

TRANSWORLD PUBLISHERS
61–63 Uxbridge Road, London W5 5SA
A Random House Group Company
www.transworldbooks.co.uk

First published in Great Britain in 2012 by Doubleday
an imprint of Transworld Publishers

Copyright © Grasshill Communications 2012
Map by Neil Gower

M. L. Stedman has asserted her right under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 to be identified as the author of this work.

This book is a work of fiction and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, is purely coincidental.

A CIP catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

ISBNs 9780857521002 (hb)
9780857521019 (tpb)

This book is sold subject to the condition that it shall not,
by way of trade or otherwise, be lent, resold, hired out,
or otherwise circulated without the publisher's prior consent in any form of binding or cover other than that in which it is published and without a similar condition, including this condition, being imposed on the subsequent purchaser.

Addresses for Random House Group Ltd companies outside the UK
can be found at: www.randomhouse.co.uk
The Random House Group Ltd Reg. No. 954009

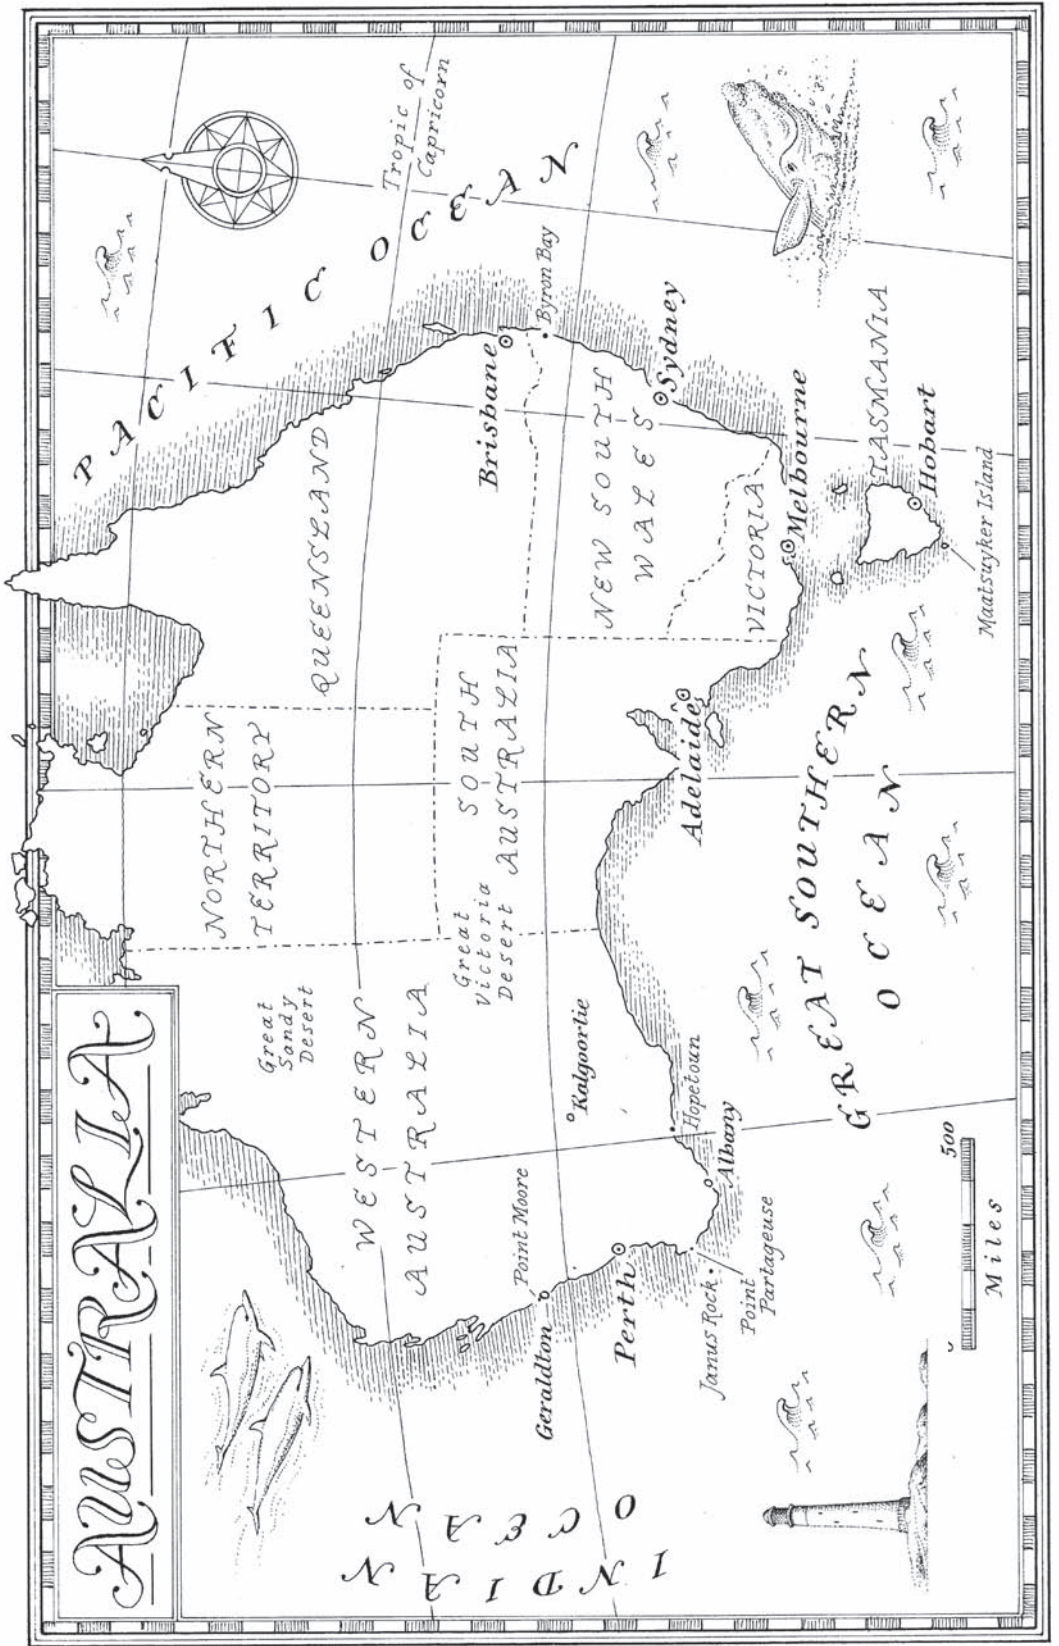

The Random House Group Limited supports the Forest Stewardship Council (FSC®), the leading international forest-certification organization. Our books carrying the FSC label are printed on FSC®-certified paper. FSC is the only forest-certification scheme endorsed by the leading environmental organizations, including Greenpeace. Our paper procurement policy can be found at www.randomhouse.co.uk/environment.

Typeset in 12/16pt Goudy Old Style by Falcon Oast Graphic Art Ltd.
Printed and bound in Great Britain by Clays Ltd, Bungay, Suffolk

2 4 6 8 10 9 7 5 3 1

In memory of my parents

PART I

27th April 1926

ON THE DAY OF the miracle, Isabel was kneeling at the cliff's edge, tending the small, newly made driftwood cross. A single fat cloud snailed across the late-April sky, which stretched above the island in a mirror of the ocean below. Isabel sprinkled more water and patted down the soil around the rosemary bush she had just planted.

'... and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil,' she whispered.

For just a moment, her mind tricked her into hearing an infant's cry. She dismissed the illusion, her eye drawn instead by a pod of whales weaving their way up the coast to calve in the warmer waters, emerging now and again with a fluke of their tails like needles through tapestry. She heard the cry again, louder this time on the early-morning breeze. Impossible.

From this side of the island, there was only vastness, all the way to Africa. Here, the Indian Ocean washed into the Great Southern Ocean and together they stretched like an edgeless carpet below the cliffs. On days like this it seemed so solid she had the impression she could walk to Madagascar in a journey of blue upon blue. The other side of the island looked back, fretful, towards the Australian mainland nearly a hundred miles away, not quite belonging to the land, yet not quite free of it, the highest of a string of under-sea mountains that rose from the ocean floor like teeth along a jagged jaw bone, waiting to devour any innocent ships in their final dash for harbour.

The Light Between Oceans

As if to make amends, the island – Janus Rock – offered a lighthouse, its beam providing a mantle of safety for thirty miles. Each night the air sang with the steady hum of the lantern as it turned, turned, turned; even-handed, not blaming the rocks, not fearing the waves: there for salvation if wanted.

The crying persisted. The door of the lighthouse clanged in the distance, and Tom's tall frame appeared on the gallery as he scanned the island with binoculars. 'Izzy,' he yelled, 'a boat!' and pointed to the cove. 'On the beach – a boat!'

He vanished, and re-emerged a moment later at ground level. 'Looks like there's someone in it,' he shouted. Isabel hurried as best she could to meet him, and he held her arm as they navigated the steep, well-worn path to the little beach.

'It's a boat all right,' Tom declared. 'And – oh cripes! There's a bloke, but—' The figure was motionless, flopped over the seat, yet the cries still rang out. Tom rushed to the dinghy, and tried to rouse the man before searching the space in the bow from where the sound came. He hoisted out a woollen bundle: a woman's soft lavender cardigan wrapped around a tiny, screaming infant.

'Bloody hell!' he exclaimed. 'Bloody hell, Izzy. It's—'

'A baby! Oh my Lord above! Oh Tom! Tom! Here – give it to me!'

He handed her the bundle, and tried again to revive the stranger: no pulse. He turned to Isabel, who was examining the diminutive creature. 'He's gone, Izz. The baby?'

'It's all right, by the looks. No cuts or bruises. It's so tiny!' she said, then, turning to the child as she cuddled it, 'There, there. You're safe now, little one. You're safe, you beautiful thing.'

Tom stood still, considering the man's body, clenching his eyes tight shut and opening them again to check he wasn't dreaming. The baby had stopped crying and was taking gulps of breath in Isabel's arms.

The Light Between Oceans

'Can't see any marks on the fellow, and he doesn't look diseased. He can't have been adrift long . . . You wouldn't credit it.' He paused. 'You take the baby up to the house, Izz, and I'll get something to cover the body.'

'But, Tom—'

'It'll be a hell of a job to get him up the path. Better leave him here until help comes. Don't want the birds or the flies getting at him though – there's some canvas up in the shed should do.' He spoke calmly enough, but his hands and face felt cold, as old shadows blotted out the bright autumn sunshine.

Janus Rock was a square mile of green, with enough grass to feed the few sheep and goats and the handful of chickens, and enough topsoil to sustain the rudimentary vegetable patch. The only trees were two towering Norfolk pines planted by the crews from Point Partageuse who had built the light station over thirty years before, in 1889. A cluster of old graves remembered a shipwreck long before that, when the Pride of Birmingham foundered on the greedy rocks in daylight. In such a ship the light itself had later been brought from England, proudly bearing the name Chance Brothers, a guarantee of the most advanced technology of its day – capable of assembly anywhere, no matter how inhospitable or hard to reach.

The currents hauled in all manner of things: flotsam and jetsam swirled as if between twin propellers; bits of wreckage, tea chests, whalebones. Things turned up in their own time, in their own way. The light station sat solidly in the middle of the island, the keeper's cottage and outbuildings hunkered down beside the lighthouse, cowed from decades of lashing winds.

In the kitchen, Isabel sat at the old table, the baby in her arms

The Light Between Oceans

wrapped in a downy yellow blanket. Tom scraped his boots slowly on the mat as he entered, and rested a callused hand on her shoulder. 'I've covered the poor soul. How's the little one?'

'It's a girl,' said Isabel with a smile. 'I gave her a bath. She seems healthy enough.'

The baby turned to him with wide eyes, drinking in his glance. 'What on earth must she make of it all?' he wondered aloud.

'Given her some milk too, haven't I, sweet thing?' Isabel cooed, turning it into a question for the baby. 'Oh, she's so, so perfect, Tom,' she said, and kissed the child. 'Lord knows what she's been through.'

Tom took a bottle of brandy from the pine cupboard and poured himself a small measure, downing it in one. He sat beside his wife, watching the light play on her face as she contemplated the treasure in her arms. The baby followed every movement of her eyes, as though Isabel might escape if she did not hold her with her gaze.

'Oh, little one,' Isabel crooned, 'poor, poor little one,' as the baby nuzzled her face in towards her breast. Tom could hear tears in her voice, and the memory of an invisible presence hung in the air between them.

'She likes you,' he said. Then, almost to himself, 'Makes me think of how things might have been.' He added quickly, 'I mean . . . I didn't mean . . . You look like you were born to it, that's all.' He stroked her cheek.

Isabel glanced up at him. 'I know, love. I know what you mean. I feel the same.'

He put his arms around his wife and the child. Isabel could smell the brandy on his breath. She murmured, 'Oh Tom, thank God we found her in time.'

Tom kissed her, then put his lips to the baby's forehead. The three of them stayed like that for a long moment, until the child began to wriggle, thrusting a fist out from under the blanket.

'Well,' Tom gave a stretch as he stood up, 'I'll go and send a signal, report the dinghy; get them to send a boat for the body. And for Miss Muffet here.'

The Light Between Oceans

'Not yet!' Isabel said, as she touched the baby's fingers. 'I mean, there's no rush to do it right this minute. The poor man's not going to get any worse now. And this little chicken's had quite enough of boats for the moment, I'd say. Leave it a while. Give her a chance to catch her breath.'

'It'll take hours for them to get here. She'll be all right. You've already quietened her down, poor little thing.'

'Let's just wait. After all, it can't make much difference.'

'It's all got to go in the log, pet. You know I've got to report everything straight away,' Tom said, for his duties included noting every significant event at or near the light station, from passing ships and weather, to problems with the apparatus.

'Do it in the morning, eh?'

'But what if the boat's from a ship?'

'It's a dinghy, not a lifeboat,' she said.

'Then the baby's probably got a mother waiting for it somewhere on shore, tearing her hair out. How would you feel if it was yours?'

'You saw the cardigan. The mother must have fallen out of the boat and drowned.'

'Sweetheart, we don't have any idea about the mother. Or about who the man was.'

'It's the most likely explanation, isn't it? Infants don't just wander off from their parents.'

'Izzy, anything's possible. We just don't know.'

'When did you ever hear of a tiny baby setting off in a boat without its mother?' She held the child a fraction closer.

'This is serious. The man's dead, Izz.'

'And the baby's alive. Have a heart, Tom.'

Something in her tone struck him, and instead of simply contradicting her, he paused and considered her plea. Perhaps she needed a bit of time with a baby. Perhaps he owed her that. There was a silence, and Isabel turned to him in wordless appeal. 'I suppose, at a pinch . . .' he conceded, the words coming with great difficulty, 'I could – leave the signal until the morning. First thing, though. As soon as the light's out.'

The Light Between Oceans

Isabel kissed him, and squeezed his arm.

'Better get back to the lantern room. I was in the middle of replacing the vapour tube,' he said.

As he walked down the path, he heard the sweet notes of Isabel's voice as she sang, 'Blow the wind southerly, southerly, southerly, blow the wind south o'er the bonnie blue sea.' Though the music was tuneful, it failed to comfort him as he climbed the stairs of the light, fending off a strange uneasiness at the concession he had made.